There's no Fortnite for Android release date yet but when it does launch , you won't find it among the game apps in the Google Play Store, Epic Games officially today. Instead you'll have to download Fortnite for Android from the company website and sideload the game onto your Google-powered mobile devices. This is an unprecedented move for a game with as big an audience as Fortnite enjoys. Epic has given two reasons for this move, the first is that they want a 'more direct' connection with its audience - similar to how Epic Games handles Fortnite on PC. The second, likely bigger, reason, is that Epic doesn't want to share its money with Google, which would take a 30% cut. If the game was on the Google Play Store, Epic wants to have a direct relationship with our customers on all platforms where that's possible", according to CEO Tim Sweeney. This means that Epic would have released Fortnite the same way on iOS, if only Apple didn't require apps to be vetted before they made it out to the public. Fortnite is one of the most popular games around right now, so regardless of its release strategy, it will find an audience, ut it will be interesting to see how the game performs outside of the Play Store - and whether or not this is a sign of things to come. We don't know how this will affect Fortnite, its audience, or even the Android app ecosystem as a whole. Fortnite made $15 million during its first three weeks on iOS alone - we're no mathematicians, but 30% of that is a lot of money. We can definitely see the logic Epic is following with this release strategy. But will it work? That much remains to be seen. There will be some security concerns with this approach, and it will surely bring some scammers out of the woodworks that may try to get people to download fake .apks. Sweeney doesn't seem to worry about this, saying that "Gamers have proven able to adopt safe software practices, and gaming has thrived on the open PC platform through many sources." We'll continue to follow the Fortnite for Android saga, including keeping a lookout for that mystery release date. Check out our list of the best free games Via the Verge (opens in new tab) Google wants you to find the best apps faster, so it's introduced a new section to the Play Store called Android Excellence. The banner on the Editor's Choice page will spotlight apps and games that "deliver incredible user experiences on Android, use many of our best practices, and have great design, technical performance, localization, and device optimization." Last month, Google spotlighted the winners of its second annual Google Play Awards. Several of the apps are, not surprisingly, represented on the Android Excellence page. Google says this list will be updated quarterly with hand-picked selections from its editorial team. Check out the first round of apps and games below: Android Excellence Apps Android Excellence Games When Carrotmob organized its first buy-in at a liquor store in San Francisco's Mission District in 2008, it touched off a movement around the world. Since then the company has backed some 250 campaigns run by nonprofits, schools, and even city councils in 20 different countries in which mobs of people shop at small businesses—coffee shops, restaurants, ice cream parlors—that agreed to invest the profits in environmentally friendly improvements. Now Carrotmob has brought its cause consumerism to a global scale, first with a campaign with Thanksgiving Coffee and then, announced last week, a partnership with Unilever, which will combine Carrotmob's understanding of innovative sustainability supporting campaigns with Unilever's massive market power. "There's always been this sense that someday we can go bigger and bigger and bigger," says founder Brent Schulkin. "When we've done stuff in the past we weren't dealing with global supply chains. Thanksgiving is big enough that it has big company issues." Here's the deal: If shoppers bought $150,000 in coffee through the Carrotmob website, Thanksgiving Coffee would have made initial investments in a sail-powered container ship (the first of its kind for a coffee company) that would help it cut the amount of oil it burns to bring beans to its roastery in Fort Bragg, California. Carrotmob didn't meet their sales goal, but the funds raised will still go to clean-burning cook stoves for the communities that grow the roaster's coffee. We've shown that with 1,000 mobbers you can change a small business in your community. And now we want to see, what if you have 5,000, 10,000, 20,000? The partnership with the coffee company came about when Schulkin asked Thanksgiving Coffee if there was a project they dreamed of doing, but never found economically viable. They floated the sailboat concept. "I thought that idea was so awesome," he says, "and I convinced them that they could go for it if we spent enough money." It's the same idea that informs Carrotmob's small projects, which are still ongoing—campaigns are coming up in Hungary, Belgium, and Sweden—just on a much larger scale. "We've shown that with 1,000 mobbers you can change a small business in your community," says Schulkin. "And now we want to see, what if you have 5,000, 10,000, 20,000? And then after we do that, what happens when we get 100,000 or a million people and then 50 million people? That's the motivation behind the new partnership with Unilever, the world's third largest seller of consumer packaged goods, with over 400 different brands. And while Carrotmob sees the cooperation as an opportunity to make an impact on a global scale, for Unilever it's a marketing win: a way to authentically build environmental credibility and engage with customers. "We of course started this as an advocacy thing and that's still what drives us and our community," says Schulkin. "But we're learning that while we see it as advocacy they see it as the future of cause marketing and so we're really excited that this match up seems to work for both sides." An upcoming change to Google's Play Store policies will allow gambling and betting Android apps that use real money in 15 more countries, including the US, according to 9to5Google. Currently, gambling apps are only allowed in four countries: Brazil, France, Ireland, and the United Kingdom. The new rules will be applied starting on March 1st, and they'll permit gambling apps in Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Japan, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Romania, Spain, Sweden, and the United States. Of course, each country will have its own limitations on what kind of online gambling is legal, with some countries allowing online casinos, sports betting, lotteries, and daily fantasy sports, and some being more restrictive. The restrictions are also complicated. Most countries only allow lotteries if they're run by the government, but some, like the UK, don't have that restriction. And as is often the case, what's allowed in the US varies on a state-by-state basis. Anyone looking to release a gambling app will have to do their legal homework first, considering the patchwork of laws and regulations permitting specific types of online gambling in the US. The US has the largest details box by far. The change won't be opening the floodgates for just anyone to release a slot machine app. Currently, Google requires developers to go through an application process to get their gambling apps on the Play Store, and the new policies won't be removing that requirement. The application ensures that the developer uploading the app is licensed to run a gambling operation in the country where the app will be sold. Before this change, users who wanted to use gambling apps on their Android phones would have to sideload them, a practice that Google has been discouraging more and more as time goes on. iPhone users, on the other hand, have been allowed to download them straight from the App Store. Of course, it could be argued that many games and apps that are on the Play Store today already include gambling mechanics (any game that includes loot boxes, for example, or apps that allow people to make bets on Wall Street). The apps that will be allowed under this policy differ in that they'll be allowing apps that are purely made for gambling, using real money. If I could make one request to Google, it'd be to let people hide gambling apps like they're allowed to hide gambling ads. Google was not immediately available to comment on the policy change. Google's Play Store is where most Android users shop for new apps. If you're new to Android, you might not even realize there are other—and in some cases, better—options. Here are three Google Play Store alternatives I recommend. * Amazon Appstore for Android. You don't have to own a Kindle Fire to download apps to an Android device from Amazon's Appstore. To install Amazon's Appstore on your Android, however, you'll need to take a few extra steps, such as ensuring your device can download from "unknown sources." How you set that up can depend on your Android device. On my Samsung Galaxy Note, for instance, I went into Settings > Security > Device administration and checked "Unknown sources." (Business Insider recently posted a video showing how to install Amazon Appstore on non-Amazon Android devices.) Why bother with Amazon's Appstore? Though it is more limited than Google's Play Store in terms of available apps, Amazon offers paid apps for free every day, many of which are games. You might also find some discounts on apps you wouldn't find elsewhere. * Tablified Market. Tablified is available in the Google Play Store, and it does a far better job than Google of showcasing Android tablet-optimized apps. The $2 Pro version doesn't have ads, it lets you sort every category by free and paid apps, and you can search by rating and more. It's worth the upgrade price, especially if you've just invested in a new Android tablet and want to zero in on tablet apps. (For more about Tablified, read my review "Looking for Android Tablet Apps? Get Tablified.") * AppBrain is another free app you can download from the Google Play Store. Along with showcasing new and hot apps of the day, AppBrain scans the apps on your device, then gives you solid recommendations (at least in my case) on other apps you might like. There are additional alternative app stores for Android including SlideME and GetJar, both of which are worth a look. Beware, though, that allowing downloads from "unknown sources," and downloading apps from alternative app stores in general, may put your Android device at risk. Then again, downloading apps from Google's Play Store isn't 100 percent safe either. If you plan to download lots of apps, install a trustworthy security app. In my experience, TrustGo's Antivirus & Mobile Security app does a good job of scanning app downloads and warning of potential threats—and it's free.
